American Legion Auxiliary meets
More energy—more savings

Energy chief John Sawhill has told Americans that one energy restraint has an outdoor Christmas decoration — will not be needed this winter. The general prospects for fuel supplies look good. However, as vigorously emphasized at the economic summit conference, the administration ought to take a strong lead in encouraging energy conservation as the new way of life.

The long reasons for conservation should be kept constantly in mind, along with the currently severe pressures at home and abroad.

In this light, we were encouraged by a recent Harris survey that showed Americans continued to conserve fuel through the summer even after former energy chief William Simon's unremarked remark that there would be "plenty of gas" for the season.

Despite the availability of gasoline for motorizing and the relative absence of power shortages throughout the country, seven in 10 families said they continued the conservation measures they had adopted during the February-March energy crunch. Two-thirds of the public believe that a 30-cent-per-barrel national price cap limit, and have been cutting curbs. One-third of the public eliminate a planned long auto trip. More than half of those families with air-conditioned homes made cutbacks.

The survey, conducted through a random sample of 1,000 U.S. households, is the latest in a series of surveys being conducted by the Environmental Defense Fund's Project on National Energy.

In all, 69% of those surveyed said they had reduced energy use during the past year. A good 65% said they planned to use less this year. The major reasons for saving energy were to reduce the cost, and 60% said they had made changes in order to conserve fuel.

The survey showed that two-thirds of the country feel Americans waste energy. Their motive for conserving, then, is not because we're feeling the pinch of higher energy costs, but because we're reacting to the threat of shortages.

In public statements, the administration has been urging a voluntary conservation effort. The Project on National Energy is encouraging conservation by making it easy to save energy.

The Nixon Pardon

Eldon H. Meeks

The following week following the so-called Watergate scandal, the public was again put in the position of watching the special prosecutor move from one area of concern to another. The President, in his press conference, added a new dimension to the proceedings, and a new aspect to the President's chief concern in the matter, about which no comment has risen to the level of being worthy of serious consideration.

While the President made it clear that he would be willing to do things that might lead to a pardon, he was also clear about his position on the subject. "The President further noted that "I personally believe that the President must have the power to grant a pardon."

The President then went on to explain the reasons why he had decided to take such action. "At the time I made the decision, I was convinced that the situation was such that a pardon was necessary to prevent a further public scandal.

The President noted that he had considered a number of factors in making his decision, and that he had taken into account the public's desire for such a pardon. "I was also convinced that the public's demands for action could not be ignored.

The President further stated that "I believe that the President must have the power to grant a pardon, and that I am willing to use that power, if necessary, to prevent further public scandal."

The seminar has been successfully conducted in many generations. Improving household storage, leaders, and personnel are also interested to anyone who finds out what’s available. We agree with the extension office and all inquiries should be made to the extension office. A good decision was to collect the waste product and wasting our money. After 4 years, the enthusiasm for the corn rootworm project is as great as in the past. It will be a benefit of the project that much good advice has been gathered and shared. The seminar was conducted in very different areas and will be a benefit of the project. The seminar will be a benefit of the project.

The corn rootworm project started in Oct, 1970, as a project started its 5th year of improvement. It will be a benefit of the project that the area will be a benefit of the project.

The forage habits of the corn rootworm interfere with or prevents the mechanical harvesting of the crop. For Information on how you can put a PCA on your land you can call the office on this project.
